Thermometer, thēr-mom'e-tēr, n. an instrument for measuring the variations of sensible heat or temperature.—adj. Thermomet'ric, -al, pertaining to, or made with, a thermometer.—adv. Thermomet'rically.—For the Centigrade and the Fahrenheit scale and their relations to each other, see Centigrade and Fahrenheit. In the Réaumur scale, still largely used in Russia and Germany, the freezing-point is marked zero, and the space between this and boiling-point is divided into 80 degrees. To reduce it to Fahrenheit, multiply by $\frac{9}{8}$ and add 32; to Centigrade, increase the number by one-fourth of itself. Thus: $F = \frac{9}{8} C + 32 = \frac{9}{8} R + 32$; $C = \frac{8}{9} (F - 32) = \frac{8}{9} R$; $R = \frac{8}{9} (F - 32) = \frac{8}{9} C$.—Maximum thermometer, one that registers the maximum temperature to which it is exposed; Minimum thermometer, one that registers the minimum temperature to which it is exposed.
